Speaker 1: Arsenal's resurgence in the Premier League this season is genuinely exciting. With young talents like Bukayo Saka and Emile Smith Rowe, the team's future looks bright. Their development under Arteta's guidance has shown promising results. I think this season could be the tipping point for them to challenge for the title again.

Speaker 2: While I agree the young players have potential, we can't overlook the glaring defensive issues they still face. Their backline seems to crumble under pressure, which has cost them crucial points in the past. Relying solely on youth can be a recipe for inconsistency, especially against seasoned teams.

Speaker 1: True, but Arteta has improved their defensive tactics significantly. The structure looks better, and there are signs of improvement. It's also worth noting their attacking play has been more dynamic. If they can find consistency, the title race is definitely within reach.

Speaker 2: But consistency is key in the Premier League, and Arsenal still seems to falter against mid-table teams. Their past performances raise concerns. Additionally, do you think their depth is strong enough to compete through a grueling season?
